The property-owners along the line of Valentines lane are endeavoring to save a majestic chestnut tree which stands on the line of the proposed improvement. This tree, whose trunk is more than twenty-five feet in circumferance, is said to be the largest tree of its kind in the State, and as it projects only four feet on the sidewalk, the Addermen are urged to leave it standing. They are further utged to change the name of the street to Chest-nut-ave. In honor of the tree. The request will probably be granted.

morning a long spar, which probably came from some wrecked vessel, drifted ashore and attracted considerable attention, as the stick was covered over with goose barnacles so thick that the wood was invisible. A large number were taken off by the bathers to be kept as relies. This species of barnacles is not common in these parts and many thousands of the strange growth were on the huge he ever saw. This barnacle attaches itself, by a disk which is at the base of its neck, forming a long stem, and from its long ne k it is given the name of goose barnacle. It is difficult to detach it when once it has secured its hold. It resembles a soft shell clam when it pulls in its feeder or hand. This sea animal is a free swimmer, but attaches itself in most cases, and thereafter remains fast. It is generally found attached to some floating object, such as a log, plank and sometimes to the botiom of a vessel. It gets its food with the feeder, which it throws out from its shell, and uses it something like a net. The feeder has a
